Self-Directed Learning: Managing Self and Managing Others

Barbara Lasky* and Diana Rajendran

In this age of universities operating on business principles, the student is seen as the focus of the teacher's endeavours. Engagement in the process of learning, or knowing, is an essential component in the transformation of an individual. The process of engagement, where it involves some degree of learner initiative, is often referred to as 'self-directed learning'. The article first discusses, albeit briefly, the meaning of learning and how that differs from self-directed learning. Second, the study itself is discussed, and the results given. Some comments are made. Finally, the authors posit that structuring learning opportunities that help student-learners move from inappropriate ideas about learning to be able to facilitate their own learning, not only helps them make the best of their learning opportunities, but is a responsible and valuable way for universities to serve their student community, and ultimately, to serve employer needs for mature, organisationally effective, employees.

Field of Research: Management

1. Introduction

In this age of universities operating on business principles, the student is seen as the focus of the teacher's endeavours. The authors posit that the opportunity for students to 'diagnose their learning needs, formulate learning goals ...select and implement learning strategies, and evaluate [their] outcomes' (Knowles, 1975, cited in Lowry, 2003, p.1) will lead to their 'being able to make the best use of learning opportunities in further education and employment' (Johnston, 2000, p.1). Further, it is the author's view that structuring learning opportunities that help students move from their often 'inappropriate conception of what learning is and involves' (Gamache, 2002, p. 277) to a point from which they can 'become their own authority' (Gamache, 2002, p. 292) is a responsible and valuable way to serve both the short and long term aspirations of the students, and the employers need for mature, organizationally effective employees. An essential ingredient of such endeavors is the need to create a culture that encourages reflection, open-mindedness, and flexibility, and respects the concept of adding value, in order to assist the student-stakeholder 'to make decisions about what training and developmental experiences will occur, and how' (McNamara, 1999, p.1).
